During the community meeting, developers dismissed locals' concerns about dangerous levels of airborne pollution with the suggestion to limit your time outside. This response inadequately addresses the broader environmental impact, including the contamination of Sydney's drinking water by airborne and waterborne microplastics. A decision to proceed with the approval of this proposed development in the Southern Highlands would be extremely disappointing, given the potential risks to public health and the environment. It is imperative for government officials to take a strong stand against this project and prioritise sustainable and responsible development practices.
